From the Mediterranean to the Pacific

By Rebecca Graulich

Valencia, Spain, referred to as the city of flowers, is located on the Mediterranean coast. It boasts a rich culture expressed through architecture, cuisine, festivals and museums. It also has bragging rights to both traditional and contemporary musical groups, including The Spanish Brass.

This all-brass quintet performed for FLCCA on October 22. Of the five musicians, four are founding members. Sergio Finca Quiros, the tuba player, is the only new addition to the group.

The founders met at a Spanish Youth Orchestra in 1989. Their first break was winning a French music competition in 1996. The following year they performed for an opera in Kiev, Ukraine. Carlos Beneto Grau, the musician who spoke at our FLCCA concert, described playing in Kiev as “a very emotional experience.” The group has since played in 35 countries.

When asked if audiences vary in different countries, Sergio noted that Asian audiences clap very orderly and simultaneously stop clapping. The Italians, on the other hand, go wild. “Americans are more like the Italians,” he observed.

Spanish Brass has commissioned 90 musical scores to be written especially for them. They typically begin their performances with musica seria, serious classical music. This provides them the opportunity to demonstrate their talents and showcase the capabilities of their instruments. The second half of their concerts is typically popular music. They perform approximately 100 concerts a year.

The group describes themselves as gastronomically adventurous and interested in exploring the cities where they are performing. With the few hours of free time they had in Folsom, what did they do? They shopped at Sam’s Club and Best Buy.
